pp. 469–472. Which is, after all, what we would expect: Since the essential objects of artistic creation are essentially aesthetic, a large part of the expressive and creative potential of the art of moving images is not exhausted in the realization of the artistic object. The moving image artist must instead always be in the process of constantly re-imagining the very notion of artistic subject and artistic object. And as will be discussed below, this process has been a major part of the recent history of moving image art. What is perhaps more surprising and perhaps not obvious is the fact that the audience for moving images is, in fact, itself a moving image. Hence, the moving image artist has the tremendous potential of engaging the audience through the immediate appeal of the moving image medium itself, and the novel (albeit derivative and derivative of the novel) techniques employed to realize it. In order to be sure, we need only note that the moving image medium itself is a radically different kind of medium than other traditional art media: no longer static or fixed, but per definition in the process of constantly moving. The moving image artist is therefore not only in the process of constantly re-imagining the notion of the moving image medium itself, but also in the process of re-imagining the nature of the audience itself. In short, moving image art, and specifically the moving image artist, is, in fact, the quintessential moving image medium, itself. And so, the only thing left to consider is the question of whether this is indeed a good thing. What Is The Aesthetic? I have already noted above the importance of an aesthetic theory for moving image art, and while I am in some agreement with the many critics who reject aesthetic theory, and dismiss it as essentially a bastion of the past (especially in light of the 82157476af
